Teaching Experience

i) Undergraduate

First-year level

- “Introduction to the History of Art, Design, and Visual Culture,” Fall 2018 (100 students); Winter 2022 (170 students). A new course that introduces students to the practices and skills of visual analysis, understandings of design, and interactions with visual culture. It is not a standard chronological narrative of art historical images.
- “Past into Present,” Fall 2000 (168 students in three sections); Fall 2005 (300 students in three sections). History starts here, with the news and public debates of today. This course examines how our understanding of the world we live in is shaped by our knowledge of history. The course is divided into three modules, and is team-taught by three professors in the History Department. My module, Monstrous Visions: A Survey of the Grotesque, considers historical exhibitions of those humans considered unusual in Europe and North America in order to think more complexly about our contemporary fascination with difference and social deviancy (on, for example, talk shows like Jerry Springer).
- “History of the Body,” Spring 2001 (65 students; team taught with Steve Turner); Spring 2002 (130 students); Spring 2005 (100 students); Spring 2007 (100 students). Examines how the body has been imagined, experienced, and controlled, both historically and today, by art, medicine, technology, religion, science, and popular culture. It considers the sexualized and pregnant body, the sinful and diseased body, the aesthetic and medicalized body, and the body as machine from Galen and Descartes to the age of the computer, the cyborg, and the gene.
- “Introduction to Art History: Renaissance to Modern,” Summer 1994 (12 students); Fall 1999 (25 students); Fall 2000 (28 students); Spring 2003 (45 students); Fall 2004 (40 students). Surveys the history of visual culture, with an emphasis on contemporary debates and issues within the field of art history.

“Arts 1000,” tutorial leader, 1996-1997, 1997-1998, 1998-1999.

“Sociology of Art,” Spring 1992 (25 students). Emphasizes the experience of art institutions and recent critiques of museums.

Upper level

“Bodies, Sex, and Death in Early Modern Italy,” Intersession 2012 (26 students);

Intersession 2015 (29 students), School in Cortona, taught on site in Cortona, Florence, Siena, and Arezzo. Summer session 2016 (40 students).

Surveys the visual culture of the Italian Renaissance, with an emphasis on the changing status of the artist and the social uses of portraiture. Issues of the representation of women, the colonial “other” and the body are part of a rethinking of Italian Renaissance “humanism.”

“Seventeenth-Century Art, On-Site in Rome,” Intersession 2003; Intersession 2007.

Covering similar themes as the course described above, this course features teaching on-site, with special visits to the print archives, Il Museo Storico Nazionale dell’Arte Sanitaria, and Palazzo Farnese, among many other locations.

“Approaches to Cultural Studies: From Television to the Computer Age,” Spring 1998 (68 students); Spring 1999 (24 students); Spring 2001 (44 students); Spring 2003 (50 students); Fall 2004 (40 students); Spring 2006 (32 students); Spring 2007 (40 students). Analyzes the multiple ways in which individuals, social groups and their cultural products both make meaning within and resist the dominant cultural formations of their place and time. Examines the historical development of cultural studies as well as its central concerns today.

“Modern Art,” Fall 1996 (40 students); Fall 1998 (35 students); Spring 2001 (40 students); Fall 2003 (60 students). A survey of modern art and an introduction to ways of thinking about it. Major themes include rapidly changing artistic movements, art institutions, and the relationship between art and war.

- “Canadian Art,” Spring 1998 (20 students); Fall 2020 (85 students); Winter 2022 (100 students); Winter 2023 (90 students). At first this course highlighted the visual culture of the Atlantic Provinces but now it is based in western Canada, featuring such themes as land, colonialism, identity, nationalism, war, and region.
- “Art Now,” Spring 2005 (40 students). Surveys contemporary visual culture produced in Europe and North America from 1950 until the present day. Includes discussions of painting, printmaking, sculpture, architecture and photography, as well as conceptual, performance, installation and body art.
- “Vision and Visuality: Looking and Knowing during the Medieval and Early Modern Periods,” ARTH 311 B1; Winter 2010 (24 students at the University of Alberta); Fall 2011 (24 students); Winter 2013 (23 students). Taught as 411/511 Winter 2019 (10 students); Winter 2023 (25 students). This course considers different theoretical approaches to visuality, focusing largely on European visual culture, art, medicine and “science” from the twelfth to the eighteenth centuries. Topics will include the social regulation of looking and being looked at; the relationship between seeing and the other senses, especially touch; and technologies of visual investigation, including microscopy.

Upper-level (Honours Seminars)

- “Rethinking Art History,” Fall 1996 (12 students). Introduces students to recent challenges to and changes within art history. Topics include the social distinctions made between so-called high art and popular culture, the construction of the canon and the culture wars debate.
- “Studies in Popular Culture,” Fall 2000 (10 students); Fall 2003 (11 students); Spring 2006 (13 students). Considers various debates about the history, status and effects of popular culture. Begins with an examination of current theories of popular culture and their impact upon the study of history. It then considers a number of close readings of contemporary North-American visual culture, especially advertising, TV, and film.
- “Historians and the Visual” Spring 2007 (7 students). This course considers how historians are currently responding to the visual realm, while introducing history students to critical visual theory, including discussions of visuality, in which vision itself is considered an historical and cultural, rather than merely biological, act. It includes examinations of various visual media, offering students historical understandings of the cultural development of maps, diagrams, and photographs, for example, while encouraging them to appreciate both the diversity and complexity of visual forms of communication.
- “The Body in Early Modern Europe, 1450–1800” Fall 2008 (16 students); Winter 2012 (12 students); Fall 2014 (8 students); Fall 2016 (10 students); Winter 2020 (14 students);

Fall 2022 (9 students). The study of early modern bodies is a distinctive field of inquiry, and this seminar introduces students to its historiography, major debates, and dominant themes, with an emphasis on visual articulations of the body. We analyzed, for example, the gendered rituals of Renaissance anatomy, the ways in which monstrous bodies communicated conceptions of self, sex, and 'race,' and the social construction of disease.

"Contemporary Body Art," Fall 2008 (15 students) This course examines a range of art works since 1970 which feature the human body as an object or conceptual theme. It features but is not limited to photographic, video, performance and bioart made by North American, Aboriginal, European and Asian artists. Instead of attempting to survey this field chronologically or strictly by medium, the course explores it thematically, engaging students with theories of the body and embodiment, as well as with specific art works.

ii) Graduate

"The History of Feminist Thought," Spring 1998 (10 students); Fall 1999 (5 students). The course begins with a review of Liberal, Socialist and Radical feminisms, moving on to consider various feminist approaches informed by post-structural, post-colonial, psychoanalytic and queer theories. Main themes include recent feminist critiques of epistemology, the subject, representation and language.

"Theories and Methods in the History of Art, Design, and Visual Culture," Fall 2013 (7 students); Fall 2015 (10 students); Fall 2019 (17 students); Fall 2020 (12 students); Fall 2023 (13 students). This course provides participants with an introduction to theories and methodologies in the study of art history and visual culture, examining a wide range of approaches, covering both historical and contemporary examples. The material is organized thematically, according to the site of meaning emphasized by the method (i.e. the site of production, site of representation, and site of reception), and includes biographical, formal, iconographic, semiotic, Marxian, feminist, and phenomenological approaches to the study of visual culture, as well as those informed by literary theory, film studies, queer theory, post-colonial theory, material culture studies, critical museum theory, and the study of visibility.

"Graduate Research Seminar," Winter 2015 (8 students). This course reflects on issues related to professionalization and current debates surrounding the definition and purpose of universities, along with an intensive focus on preparing for the candidacy examination and the proposal. It will ideally be taken during the first year (second semester), although it might alternatively be taken during the second year (first semester). ARTH 677 is designed to complement and extend the pro-seminar series organized for graduate students by the Department of Art and Design.

Independent Studies

"Women, Gender, Space, and Architecture," 2021 Winter semester (with MA student).

"The Britney Spears Phenomenon," 2002-2003 (Honours Thesis with an upper-level undergraduate student in the History Department at UNB).

"Women Artists and the Body," Spring 2001 (one advanced student at the New Brunswick Craft College). A reading course that included periodic discussion and evaluation of the student's textile work. One written assignment.

"Critical Visual Theory," Spring 2001 (one graduate student in the History Department at UNB).
A reading course that included over 30 books on feminist art history, cultural studies and semiotics. Weekly meetings and one written assignment.
